Pack includes: FRP-BASE-06.vxp.The present invention relates to field-effect transistor power control circuitry for use in microwave integrated circuits. The transmission of data in the microwave region of the electromagnetic spectrum, as well as in other parts of the spectrum, is currently accomplished via modulated amplitude or frequency signals that are transmitted across a line. Generally speaking, these lines, commonly known as microwave links, have a predetermined range of operation and operate in a regime where line losses are a significant contributor to a received signal's level and become the limiting factor in the maximum obtainable data rate. These microwave links have been proliferating in recent years due to the tremendous increase in data transmission requirements to, for example, user installations for wireless communication, personal area networks and other types of applications. The transmission mediums associated with these microwave links have evolved from the coaxial cable lines of the past to point-to-point unshielded twisted-pair communication lines, and these lines have increasingly become the preferred medium for data transmission because they are low in attenuation and have low parasitic crosstalk. These communication lines, however, are of limited capacity, and as their installed base increases, the demand for increased data throughput grows along with it. Thus, even in the midst of a satisfied consumer base of users, a need exists for line replacements or upgrades to the communication medium. Because the communication mediums are considered to be xe2x80x9cproduction-linexe2x80x9d products, these upgrades must be made with minimal impact on the communication medium's intended reliability. Such an upgrade would necessarily require the replacement of a given medium. This replacement process should be as simple as possible. However, the replacement of a medium also requires communication medium connections to not be obstructed. It is possible to add new mediums, as data rates have increased; however, doing so changes the impedance of the medium. Thus, a change in impedance is required when one medium is replaced by another. In this regard, the impedance of a circuit must be chosen to match the impedance of the newly added medium to maximize the signal throughput. If the circuit fails to properly match the impedance of the new medium, the impedance will fall outside
